PERSONAL STATEMENT

One of the most meaningful experiences of my life was starting a full-time job as a rehab technician at Memorial Hermann Katy Rehabilitation Hospital. This experience was a "first time" for many important aspects of my life. It was my first time ever holding the responsibility of a full-time job, as well as the opportunity of playing a significant role in the overall treatment of patients. From wiping down mats in the treatment gym to assisting therapists with transfers and treatment activities, this experience has not only taught me a lot about the actual job of being an inpatient rehabilitation therapist, but also how important it is to step out of one's comfort zone. As someone who has only worked part-time at a restaurant and done about 100 hours of outpatient observation prior to this job, entering into a work environment where I was surrounded by such competent and highly-skilled individuals was very overwhelming. However, through perseverance and determination, I was able to turn a very uncomfortable environment into one where the knowledge and experiences of my superiors were at my fingertips, as well as a place where I feel like I truly belonged as part of the team. This experience has taught me the highly valuable skill that is stepping out of one's comfort zone. Without a doubt, this ability will be one that I will take with me for the rest of my life.

Growing up, I have always had a fascination for movement. This fascination personified itself through a passion for powerlifting, a sport that requires immense attention to detail and a thorough understanding of biomechanics. The experiences I had with competing and placing top 10 at the collegiate national level for two consecutive years has taught me much about how the human body moves, as well as how it does not. My extended involvement with this sport inevitably led to injuries. At first, I was against being told to reduce my involvement with powerlifting and attend physical therapy because I doubted therapy's effectiveness. However, doing so created one of the most significant turning points in life. Not only did attending physical therapy allow me to resume powerlifting, but it also opened my eyes to its world and restorative powers.

For a long while, I perceived physical therapy as a treatment only injured athletes needed, and that this was what I wanted to do with my athletic experience. In order to treat these athletes, I figured that getting a physical therapy license was the logical thing to do. As a result, I began working towards building a strong application for physical therapy school by first completing my outpatient observation hours at Quentin Mease Hospital. When I was told that I would be observing therapists handle patients in the treatment gym, I thought I would only encounter athletes, as I automatically associated the term "gym" with athletics. However, as I enter the hospital on my first day, it became clear that the world of therapy is much more expansive than I had thought. Immediately, I became uncomfortable with the idea of working with a patient who had just suffered a stroke or amputation because of how dissimilar it was from what I had imagined. This made me question whether or not I should continue to pursue a physical therapy license. Nonetheless, I decided to persevere and give the volunteering a real chance before I consider a career change. One day, as I showed up to the hospital, I witnessed an amputee patient who I had been observing for a few weeks get up from his wheelchair and, with his prosthesis, take a step that seemed as miraculous as a baby's first. Witnessing the patient's immense joy and sense of accomplishment that followed made me realize how badly I wanted to be a part of that patient's recovery. This experience taught me that no matter what setting of physical therapy I end up working in, helping a patient reach his or her movement goals will always be worthwhile.

My continued pursuit of building a strong physical therapy school application then led to my full time employment as a full time technician at Memorial Hermann Rehabilitation Hospital in Katy. As an inpatient technician, I actively participate in the patients' treatment and progression. As a result of seeing these patients so often, I find myself developing personal relationships with them. Overtime, I noticed how patients who had genuine and positive relationships with their therapists recovered much quicker than those who did not. For example, I specifically remember helping a therapist with her evaluation of a stroke patient on his admit day. At first, he had close to zero control of the right side of his body. However, what he did have complete control over was his motivated attitude and willingness to trust in those responsible for his treatment. After about two weeks of treatment, this man went from having a severe case of shoulder subluxation to shaking my hand with that same arm every day he saw me. This seemingly impossible feat ultimately taught me the importance of a genuine relationship and trust between a patient and his or her care team.

As it became time for me to apply for physical therapy programs, I came across The University of St. Augustine's Residential Doctor of Physical Therapy program in Austin, Texas. The more research I did, the more obvious it became that this school was unique and a good match for me. As a resident of Houston, one of this nation's most diverse cities, Austin's similar community will be nothing short of home for me. In addition, I personally prefer attending smaller classes, as it allows for a much more personal and genuine relationship between the instructor and students. The University of St. Augustine's 24:1 student to faculty ratio coupled with faculty members' status as both educators and practitioners will provide me with both an excellent and innovative education.
